Presenting and exploring new and current approaches to discourse and culture, Bloomsbury Studies in Linguistic Anthropology examines the most recent topics in this field. Publishing contemporary, cutting edge research, this series investigates social life through everyday discursive practices, making these practices visible and unveiling processes that would remain concealed without careful attention to discourse.

Titles focus on specific themes to advance the field both theoretically and methodologically, such as language contact dynamics, language revitalisation and reclamation, and language, migration and social justice. Positioning linguistic anthropology at the intersection with other fields, this series will cast light on various cultural settings across the globe by viewing important linguistic ethnographies through an anthropological lens. Standing at the frontier of this growing field, Bloomsbury Studies in Linguistic Anthropology offers a balanced view of the current state of the discipline, as well as promoting and advancing exciting new directions for research.
