Key Points from 2020 LSJ Webinar

<https://docs.google.com/document/d/12MQuMMG4td6u69l0Q1DlXXVkqkWbaLMC/>

1) Intellectual History and Canon

Reorganize: chronologically earlier parts of our (scholars and practitioners in these fields') theoretical canon include a lot of dead white men. We are urged to rethink the organization of (especially graduate) introductory courses so that they do not present only dead white men until the very end of the term. To decolonize our syllabi, we need to craft a historical narrative that is more inclusive and complex. We are faced here with the task of tracing those voices from the past which impacted the canon, or which could help us reformulate a canon.

Address troubling legacies: the work of scholars like Franz Boas, Charles Pierce, and Dell Hymes is foundational and considered canonical, but it is also important to critique the damaging parts of their work and academic practice.

Make visible: how can we find voices that have been made invisible/inaudible? This question applies to (among others) queer scholars, scholars who are not men, scholars of color, indigenous scholars, scholars from places other than the United States, and scholarship in languages other than (standardized) English(es).

Look beyond: include the work of scholars not thought of strictly as linguistic anthropologists – suggested examples are Frantz Fanon and Zora Neale Hurston – as well as drawing from related/allied fields such as Indigenous studies, folklore, sociolinguistics.

Rewrite history: how can we incorporate linguistic anthropology into a rewritten canon of the history of anthropology overall?

Broader examples: decenter European and imperial languages in our teaching, and actively search for international topics and examples.

2) Citation Practices

Challenge the theory/data binary: cite people and media which are typically excluded from academic discourse; cite non-academics; recognize that your study participants are also theorists (cf. <https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/abs/10.1177/1077800408314346> and this essay drawing on it, <https://points.datasociety.net/how-to-cite-like-a-badass-tech-feminist-scholar-of-color-ebc839a3619c>)

Look beyond (again): include the work of scholars not thought of strictly as linguistic anthropologists – suggested examples are Frantz Fanon and Zora Neale Hurston – as well as drawing from related/allied fields such as Indigenous studies, folklore, sociolinguistics.

Diverse formats: juxtapose academic works with news clippings, photos, social media posts, fiction works, and more. Especially for syllabi, consider using podcasts and videos.

Suggested practices for finding sources:

Follow linguists & other scholars of color on Twitter.

(And while on Twitter: watch for discussions of problematic scholars.)

Learn what students (especially those in marginalized groups) are reading.

Participate in interdisciplinary reading groups.

Read AAA abstracts.

Read the World Anthropologies and Transforming Anthropology sections of American Anthropologist.

More material support: in addition to citing marginalized scholars, ensure they are invited to speak and given access to other material aid.

Pass on good practices: teach our (graduate and undergraduate) students to ask who is appearing in bibliographies, who isn't, and why. Ask these same questions of your own citations. Practice "excavation" and "tracing" exercises to follow where ideas come from. (Note: references on how to do this practice would be helpful but the organizers compiling this report do not have them at hand.)

3) Syllabus Design

Start carefully: the beginning of the course frames the rest of it. Start with the tone and approach we need; we can work backward toward older scholarship if necessary.

Relevance and stakes for students: begin with and emphasize contemporary issues close to the concerns of our students (especially for undergraduates). This means different topics for different populations of students.

Adapt to the setting: for example, contrast regional news reports along with sociolinguistic work on regional dialect (in the region where we're teaching). And incorporate recent news.

Reorganize (again): chronologically earlier parts of our theoretical canon include a lot of dead white men. We are urged to rethink the organization of (especially graduate) introductory courses so that they do not present only dead white men until the very end of the term. To decolonize our syllabi, we need to craft a historical narrative that is more inclusive and complex. We are faced here with the task of tracing those voices from the past which impacted the canon, or which could help us reformulate a canon.

Recategorize: we should consider alternative ways to structure syllabi other than topics of 'race,' 'gender,' etc as is common in textbooks. Alternative categories like 'identities,' or even particular places, might allow us to weave these threads together without artificially dismembering intersectional realities. And, consider linking ideas together somewhat independently of their chronological order in history.

Be critical: students annotating their readings signals that critique of canon is welcome. We can also assign critiques rather than (or in addition to) original works, to further invite students' critiques.

Community responsibility: land acknowledgment is a good thing to include in a syllabus. And, we can bring in community activists and non-academic experts into our classrooms (and conversations) and compensate them appropriately.

Students' needs: being attentive to COVID concerns and the well-being of students is a matter of social justice. Furthermore, to address needs for inclusivity and respectful treatment, we should make it clear that all students are expected to provide their preferred name, name pronunciation, and pronouns – this should not be optional or extra.

Cover more authors: we can consider including more (but shorter) works by a wider range of authors to ensure that a syllabus does not represent, e.g., overwhelmingly men.

Black Scholars of Language (compiled by Teruko Mitsuahara, June 2020)

https://docs.google.com/document/d/1I2_E2GFDD6yqPqXEHdpREEnhvFk9gPaCVZgyJECE8Oo/edit?usp=sharing

This resource was borne from a conversation on the linganth listserv. To follow that thread and read the context of this document please search for “Re: [Linganth] Language & Culture Course / Covid syllabi and Race” in the listserv.

Much gratitude to linguistic anthropologist, Krystal Smalls for responding to a request that UCSB Linguistic graduate students Jamaal Muwwakkil and deandre miles-hercules began regarding this very topic of Black linguistic anthropology faculty in the ABA listserv. Krystal provided many of the names on the list below of Black faculty in the US and Canada who deal with language in Sociolinguistics, Linguistic anthropology, Humanities, Education, English, and Communication.

Indeed, there are many Black scholars who touch upon language in their work in and out of the formal academy, and with such a large umbrella I am sure this list of Black scholars and scholar-activists is much longer. I apologize in advance if you or someone you know is not on this list, please feel welcome to update it.

However, the 7 current (i.e. not retired) tenured or tenure-track appointments held by Black people in linguistic anthropology remains troubling. So while we're in a national conversation about structural change and racial reckoning in our spaces, I still hold that we, linganth, should ask these questions.

My hope is that in providing this list, we can all make sure that we are creating syllabi that model for undergraduates and graduate scholars the place they too can hold in our subfield. We know that modeling matters, so not only should they read Black scholars especially when discussing Black Language, but in general BIPOC should not be rare in our field that graduate students or new Phds must go looking for such representation in other disciplines to supplement a lack that should be easier to find at our subfield homefront, at our AAA parties, at conferences, in collaboration for funded projects, etc.

Thank you,
Teruko Vida Mitsuahara

Note: Bolded you will find one Linganth faculty who came to linganthro through Anthropology and not Sociolinguists or Educational linguists. One person made it through the ranks within Anthropology, Lanita Jacobs. These disciplinary boundaries matter when trying to hire diverse faculty in anthropology ranks and we must ask why this discipline has only one Black linguistic anthropologist trained in the four fields, as a TT anthropologist.

Both SCHOLAR and LANGUAGE are broadly defined. Scholars are not just those who reside in the ivory tower or have a PhD, especially since academia has systemically kept marginalized folks out of its halls. Likewise, I use language instead of linguistics because the field of linguistics has been unwelcoming to marginalized linguists, so we find them in various fields, like Education, Anthropology, Media Studies, Speech, Language and Hearing Studies, etc.
